Emotions and affective factors are two complementary concepts present in the applied linguistics literature without a consensus on the definitions of both terms. However, both, emotions and affective factors, have a strong role in language learners' appraisal dimensions.

In order to offer some answers, this presentation analyzes studies on how affective factors and emotions influence language acquisition and learning and proposes some methodological principles that can be applied to language education and that may ensure the learning of values, attitudes, skills and knowledge needed in a plurilingual and pluricultural society.
